The doctor s treatment consisted, from what I could learn, of Secale Cornutum internally, and Salt Solution injected per hypodermic into abdominal cavity; these injections were repeated at different times; patient became weaker and suffered great pain. At this stage, of about a week s duration, relatives and friends insisted patient should try homeopathy. This decision was strengthened by the fact that the attending doctor gave them to understand he nor anyone else could do no more; that patient would die. The doctor was dismissed. I was called and found patient s condition as follows: Very weak, anemic, pulse accelerated, temperature 103 degrees, complaining of weight in head, roaring in ears, and pain in abdomen. Upon examination I found that a large abscess had formed near umbilicus, evidently produced by the careless use of the hypodermatic needle, or the infection may have been caused by the saturated solution of salt, which, when used too strong, often has a tendency to break down surrounding tissues. Aside from these symptoms there was profuse epistaxis, hemorrhages from bowels hematuria and hematemesis. Arms, chest and limbs were covered in circumscribed areas with petechial spots, purplish red in color, varying in size from a pin s head to a cent; his face was pale, waxy and sunken; was extremely exhausted and weak. Such were the conditions when homeopathy was to be tried and tested as to its merits. After having evacuated, by free incision, the abscess, and...
