In the course of many years experience as the principal of the Jews Free School, London, and also as a private tutor, I have observed, with regret, the insufficiency of our present system of religious education. To assist in the amelioration of that system has long been my most anxious wish. The children of our community are taught to read and translate the Hebrew Bible; but many of them are permitted to attain maturity uninformed in the fundamental principles of our Holy and Ancient Religion. I admit that many very learned works have been composed for the instruction of Jewish youth; but, unfortunately, none of them appear to have remedied the defect of which I complain. Their style and phraseology are so complicated, that, independently of the language in which they are written, they are not adapted to the capacities of children, at the early age, when the precepts of religion and morality should be first inculcated. None can observe, without regret, the neglect into which Hebrew literature has fallen! No conscientious Israelite will deny its importance, for it is unalienably associated with his religion. Let it not be said, at this era, when the desire of...
